From the Editor

These times are tense and confusing. We have been reminded all too dramatically of the instability, risks, and dangers present in our world. It can be hard at times like these to live our lives without being distracted by the winds of change surrounding us. But we have also been reminded of our strength and resolve, our capacity to work and to act – as individuals and as a community – to uphold our values and principles for the betterment of our neighbors and ourselves. The articles published in WORK have made – and will continue to make – unique and important contributions to the successful engagement in the daily occupation of work. It is this engagement, in part, that will help with the healing and wellness of our global community . . . in body, mind, and spirit.
